MEMORANDUM FOR THE PRESIDENT

SUBJECT: Williamsburg Summit Preparatory Session on Foreign Exchange Market Intervention

Attached is a background paper discussing foreign exchange market intervention policy. It summarizes the views of other Summit countries, the results of the intervention study agreed at Versailles, and U.S. intervention policy. This will be the subject of our preparatory session on Monday, April 25.

Foreign Exchange Market Intervention Policy

In Williamsburg, you may be pressed by some of your Summit colleagues to agree to intervention by the United States to smooth short-term exchange rate movements, or even to change basic exchange rate levels or trends. We do not believe there are economic reasons for the United States to intervene for either of these purposes:

- We have no reason to think that short-term exchange rate fluctuations are a real economic problem.
- Intervention is simply not capable of changing rate levels or trends.

This is essentially confirmed by the exchange market intervention study agreed to at Versailles (in response to a U.S. proposal). The study concludes:

- Intervention can have a modest, transient impact on exchange rates; but it is basically incapable of changing underlying trends, and attempts to use it for this purpose can be counterproductive.
- It is possible for governments to affect exchange rate levels or trends -- but to do so they must make significant changes in basic economic policies.
- If countries are going to intervene, "coordinated" intervention by two or more countries has a bigger impact than the same amount of intervention by a single country; but there are no better economic reasons for this type of intervention.

Moreover, there are potential economic costs to increased U.S. intervention in foreign exchange markets.

- It would be an attempt to have the judgement of government officials override the workings of a large and efficient market.
- It would distract attention from the task which policy makers should really be focusing on: getting stable and non-inflationary policies in place, and thus bringing about stability in the fundamental determinants of exchange rate behavior.
- It would be a waste of the taxpayers' money.
- If we began intervening more often, even on a limited basis, it would be difficult to keep this from slipping into frequent and large-scale intervention.
- Frequent or large-scale intervention could actually destabilize markets.

~~CONFIDENTIAL~~

DECLASSIFIED
Authority State/Treas. Warvets
BY Dr. NARADINE 12/3/2009

Therefore, we believe the United States should maintain the basic thrust of current U.S. policy: intervening only to counter "disorderly" conditions in exchange markets. We should keep any discussions strongly focused on the principle that stability in the underlying economic and financial conditions in major countries is the real basis for exchange rate stability (a principle on which all have agreed). The "multilateral surveillance" process, underway since agreement at the Versailles Summit, is designed to bring about convergence toward sustained, non-inflationary economic growth as a primary means of stabilizing exchange markets.

The views of our Summit partners on intervention vary widely, with:

- the French and EC pressing for frequent large-scale intervention to fix or manage exchange rates;
- the Canadians, Germans and British arguing that intervention itself is not very important, but that some show of greater U.S. willingness to intervene would help settle markets; and
- the Italians and Japanese somewhere in between.

The intervention study and the general topic of intervention will be discussed by Finance Ministers in Washington on April 29. We hope that the meeting will be able to agree on a joint public statement which defuses the issue and avoids a confrontational discussion at the Summit. We will discuss this with you on Monday, April 25.
