Secretary Shultz briefed the President and members of the Cabinet on his recently-concluded trip to Japan, Korea, China and Hong Kong.

On his brief stopover in Tokyo, Secretary Shultz said that his meetings with Japanese officials had gone well, especially the sessions he had with Prime Minister Nakasone and with Foreign Minister Abe. He also reported on his conversations with the MITI and finance ministers on the trade and economic problems which bedevil our ties. Shultz finished his comments on Japan by ending as he began, by calling U.S.-Japanese relations the cornerstone of our policies in Asia and the Pacific.

The Secretary spoke of his talks in Korea with President Chun Doo Hwan and Foreign Minister Lee Bum Suk. His basic point was that U.S.-Korean relations are strong and without major problems.

On China, Secretary Shultz expressed his confidence that he had successfully carried out his discussions with the Chinese leadership, including Deng Xiaoping. Shultz said that he had held firm on Taiwan, while stating the President's determination to live up to the terms of the August 17, 1982 communique.

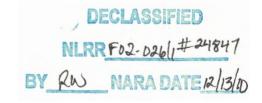

At the end of the Secretary's presentation, the President congratulated Shultz on what seemed to be a very good trip.

The meeting adjourned at 11:45 a.m.

Minutes

The Vice President reviewed his recent trip to Western Europe. He said that the private purpose of his trip had been possible changes to U.S. policy and views on those areas of the trip was to reiterate that the US was committed to deployment of the INF missiles if necessary, that the Alliance was united, that the US was committed to serious negotiations, that the US had a sound moral proposal on INF, that the Soviets did not have a serious proposal and that the US wanted them to make one. Basically, the Vice President summarized, his mission was to give strong public support to both the twin track decision of December 1979 and the zero option. The Vice President went on to summarize the views of the countries he had visited. In the Netherlands, there were problems with INF; the Belgians seemed to be firm on deployment and there had been no surprises there; the French were firm in their support of the two track decision.

In the FRG, the leaders had said that his visit was worthwhile. Chancellor Kohl had been concerned that the Andropov speech of December 1982 and the Vogel visit to Moscow had affected public support for NATO positions.

The Vice President said he had been careful to keep our of their German elections during his visit. Chancellor Kohl had told him at the end of the visit that the reiteration of the U.S. position, a combination of firmness and willingness to talk with the Soviets, and the assertion that the United States' offer in Geneva was not a take-it-or-leave-it offer had been very helpful. Kohl had told him that the Vice President's visit had been helpful in putting the INF issue in perspective in the German elections.

The Vice President observed that during his trip he had gained the sense of the Alliance beginning to come together. For example the Anglican Church in England had issued a statement which justified the possession by the United Kingdom of an independent nuclear deterrent. Mrs. Thatcher herself was firm in her support of the two-track decision and the zero option, although she was "moving around a little" concerning intermediate steps to that position. The Vice President reiterated that his talks with West European leaders had been confidential, and that there had been no leaks concerning their content. He had made a confidential report to the President on what he had been told in private.

The Vice President added that the European officials with whom he had talked had been interested in the economic news from the United States; the encouraging news on unemployment figures and leading indicators had been useful during the trip. Martin Feldstein of the President's Council of Economic Advises had held separate discussions with his counterparts.

Secretary Shultz asked if there had been discussions in Europe about agricultural trade issues with the United States. He said that these issues were among the most dangerous ones at the present, and that agricultural ministers on both sides were headed towards a conflict. If it broke out, "the dam will break." It was curious that although the European countries depended upon open trade the most, they were still considering trade wars.

The Vice President replied that Mrs. Thatcher had raised the issue, that President Mitterrand had not, although Prime Minister Mauroy had. The Vice President said that Foreign Minister Pym had objected to the U.S. wheat flour sale to Egypt, but had backed off when the Vice President had mentioned six agricultural GATT cases against the EC that the United States had registered. Mrs. Thatcher had said that the European Community was the "worst offender" in agricultural trade. The Vice President said that he had personally spoken of the necessity to negotiate differences and the importance of avoiding a trade war.

Commerce Secretary Baldrige said that he shared Secretary Shultz's concern. Although there was some posturing in European attitudes, and perhaps one more deal such as the Egyptian wheat flour sale would be possible, after that, an agricultural trade war could very well break out.

SECRET

In response to a question from the President, Treasury Secretary Regan recounted the situation in agricultural imports. He noted that the European Community subsidized its exports to bring them down to world market prices. Sugar, for example, was three times more expensive in the community the world price, but the EC exported at the world price. European leaders openly acknowledged that their policies were designed to placate their farming lobby. American farmers had for a long time felt it necessary to "teach the Europeans a lesson." The Egyptian wheat sale was intended to be that lesson.

The President said it was difficult to imagine Europe being able to produce large quantities of food for export in view of the denseness of its population and the small size of its land area.

Secretary Baldrige said that the European community had made a major effort to produce enough food to feed itself. Through subsidies European agriculture had been modernized, however, when agricultural production reached beyond the point of supplying home markets, the governments continued to subsidize agriculture and then sold the surpluses at reduced prices on the world market. U.S. taxpayers in fact paid for agricultural subsidizes also, but the U.S. food products were stored in the United States, not put on the world market as the Europeans did.

The Vice President said that the major public relations problem in Europe was to influence public opinion so that the Allies would deploy their INF missiles on schedule. The governments said that they were committed to deployments on time, but there were enormous public relations problems. There were a number of key dates this year, the first being the March 6 elections in the Federal Republic of Germany. Also in March were the French municipal elections, and perhaps there would be elections in the United Kingdom later in the year. The U.S. challenge was to maintain serious commitments to both tracks of the decision. As far as the negotiation track went, the challenge was to sustain the perception of American willingness to talk and to negotiate seriously.

Secretary Shultz then described the findings of his trip to Asia.
