TV Reviews

A PBS Documentary on Guatemala

By JOHN CORRY

IT'S not that "Guatemala: When the Mountains Tremble" is controversial; it's more that it's so badly done. The original 83-minute documentary, sanitized, so to speak, with the addition of panel discussion and explanation, now runs two hours. Public television ought to have cut its losses and forgotten the whole thing.

The documentary, on Channel 13 at 9 o'clock tonight, was shown by some other public television stations last month. News stories then said that the Public Broadcasting Service, unhappy because the original 83 minutes was "heavy handed," had delayed its release. The supplementary material, produced by WETA in Washington, was added to give it balance.

Supplementary material or not, the documentary is still a clinker. Actually, documentary is a courtesy title. "Guatemala: When the Mountains Tremble" is a vanity film, pressing a point of view: The United States and the Guatemalan Army act in concert to murder innocent people; armed revolution is the only way to obtain justice.

Never mind the obvious here: that Guatemala held an election last month, and democratically elected a president. The original documentary, produced by Skylight Pictures, was made in 1983. On the other hand, it never bothers to mention that the United States suspended military aid to Guatemala in 1977. It is too busy making its case.

Thus in the opening minutes it gives us two "historical dramatizations." In the first, it is 1954 and Ambassador John E. Peurifoy and the Guatemalan President, Jacobo Arbenz Guzmán, are having dinner at the American Embassy with their wives. The Peurifoy character, who looks like one of Frank Nitti's boys in "The Untouchables," warns Arbenz not to mess with United Fruit.

A moment later, we are at "C.I.A. Command Central" in Opa-locka, Fla. Obviously, Arbenz Guzmán did not heed the warning; men in khaki are planning a coup. As high drama, however, this isn't much, and the documentary ought to have tried reporting. In 1954, the Central Intelligence Agency did sponsor a coup in Guatemala, although it's probable that it did more for John Foster Dulles than for United Fruit.

Subsequently, the documentary gives us old newsreel and television film, interviews and a lot of footage of soldiers, guerrillas and other Guatemalans. We hear them in translation. The soldiers, politicians and an archbishop speak in voices full of hypocrisy and general meanness; guerrillas and other leftists sound like gentle saints.

Meanwhile, an Indian woman, supposedly a guerrilla, wanders in and out, talking about oppression. She also alludes to the nonexistent United States aid. The documentary does not supply her with a translator; we read the words in subtitles. It's typical of the muddled production that the Indian woman says her family does not speak Spanish, even though, staring into the Teleprompter, she's speaking in Spanish herself.

In a work like this, however, journalism doesn't matter; it's political posture that counts. When the documentary — the producer is Peter Kinoy; the co-directors are Tom Siegel and Pamela Yates — finally catches up with the guerrillas, we see that whole detachments are nicely equipped: new uniforms and automatic weapons. Where do they come from? The documentary never asks. Automatic weapons and uniforms presumably grow on trees.

In fact, we are watching agitprop, although it's not very skillfully done. High moral purpose and sanctimony aren't enough; "Guatemala: When the Mountains Tremble" is boring. In the discussion period after the documentary, however, Miss Yates, the co-director, defends her work. The documentary, she says, was meant to be an "emotional understanding," and not "a textbook account."

The other discussants are terribly polite. No one says the documentary is junk. Harry Moses, a CBS News producer, says the "credibility factor was starting to get to me" and suggests that perhaps Miss Yates and her colleagues ought to have tried some conventional reporting.

In her reply, Miss Yates has the audacity to say that part of the problem was the documentary's "low budget." In fact, the principal source of financing was the Corporation for Public Broadcasting, which operates with taxpayers' dollars. Forget the political content of the documentary now; America won't crumble because of agitprop. A better question is, why should a vanity production be subsidized? It's like indulging children with toys.

Still, public broadcasting is supposed to offer many points of view, which is possibly why we're getting this production. Certainly, PBS is acting responsibly when it insists on adding a panel discussion. That's also what it did when it presented "Television's Vietnam: The Real Story" last June. That was produced by the conservative Accuracy in Media.

There is a difference, however, in the way the two productions have been received. Moral indignation flourished over "Television's Vietnam." Public broadcasters were outraged; their integrity was threatened. Liberal columnists, meanwhile, had tantrums. Right-wingers were fouling the airwaves.

There is no comparable outcry over "Guatemala: When the Mountains Tremble," even though it seems to be a good deal more to the left than "Television's Vietnam" was to the right. Hooray for free speech and many points of view, but something is out of balance.

Once More Into the Breach

By RONALD RADOSH

More than sixty years ago, two Italian immigrants, anarchists Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti, were arrested for the murder of a paymaster and his guard during the robbery of a shoe factory in South Braintree, Mass.

Their subsequent trial, conviction and eventual execution became an international cause celebre that still stirs passions today. Many prominent figures of the 1920s believed that Sacco and Vanzetti had been convicted not on the strength of the evidence, but because they were immigrants holding radical beliefs. Supposedly, the judge was biased and the prosecution was unwilling to consider other possible suspects.

The publicity caused Governor Alvan T. Fuller to set up a review of the case in 1927, undertaken by a commission chaired by Harvard University President A. Lawrence Lowell. That body found the trial to have been fair and the defendants guilty. As a result, Lowell was excoriated by Sacco and Vanzetti's supporters.

Writing to a friend at the time, Lowell offered an explanation of why the "belief in the innocence of Sacco and Vanzetti would . . . continue forever, wholly unaffected by the evidence." Their defenders, he argued, started with the facts they wished proved, and then reconciled contradictory evidence to fit their assumption. Lowell described the faulty logic of the defenders: "the prisoners were Reds. There was violent prejudice against the Reds in the United States. Therefore the men were unfairly tried. Therefore they were innocent. Therefore it was a judicial murder for political reasons."

Now, Francis Russell, who 25 years ago supported the guilty verdict in his well received "Tragedy in Dedham," gives his updated view of the case in "Sacco and Vanzetti: The Case Resolved" (Harper & Row, 245 pages, $16.95). Basing his argument in part on fresh information, Mr. Russell argues convincingly that Sacco and Vanzetti were not simply the victims of political hysteria.

In building his case, Mr. Russell offers evidence that the two accused men were active militant anarchists pledged to violent acts against American capitalism. Not the "good shoemaker and poor fish peddler" of myth, they were followers of Luigi Galleani, who was "first and last a revolutionary," says Mr. Russell. It was not surprising that when the police found them, both Sacco and Vanzetti were armed. The Galleanists "were the fundamentalists, preaching violence, loathing all authority, with a quixotic vision of liberty and equality through destruction and chaos."

As the defense lawyers acknowledged, the trial was fair, says Mr. Russell. Whatever private views Judge Webster Thayer may have held, his courtroom demeanor was virtuous and correct. Also, by the time the famous trial opened, in May 1921, the Red Scare of 1919 had subsided. In fact, a year earlier, a revolutionary anarchist tried before Judge Thayer had been found innocent of advocating the violent overthrow of the U.S. government.

But though Mr. Russell succeeds here in proving that Sacco and Vanzetti were not the victims of politically motivated "judicial murder," he claims too much in saying that the case is now resolved, and that Sacco's guilt and Vanzetti's complicity are solidly established.

For this conclusion, he relies on a crucial new piece of evidence: a document obtained from the son of the now deceased Giovanni Gambera, a member of the very first Sacco-Vanzetti defense group. In this document Gambera said that "everyone knew that Sacco was guilty and that Vanzetti was innocent as far as the actual participation in the killing." Mr. Russell sees this statement as "irrefutable proof" of Sacco's guilt. To bolster the document's credibility, he recounts how Gambera's shocking news was enough to convince the famed anarcho-syndicalist Carlo Tresca that Sacco was guilty. Careful reading suggests, however, that Mr. Russell cannot prove such a conversation between Tresca and Gambera actually took place. The circumstantial evidence is strong, but not definitive.

The controversy over the case will therefore continue. Last year the late William Young and historian David E. Kaiser published "Postmortem: New Evidence in the Case of Sacco and Vanzetti" (University of Massachusetts Press, 188 pages, $20), in which they argued not only that Sacco and Vanzetti were innocent, but that they were victims of a political frameup. They maintain that the prosecution tampered with the evidence to make it appear as if the lethal bullet came from Sacco's pistol, when it did not. Mr. Russell, after making new ballistics tests, concludes that there was no tampering.

On this kind of evidence, I find Francis Russell's explanations more compelling than those of the ardent defenders of Sacco and Vanzetti's innocence. His book will not convince those on the other side. Still, he cuts through much of the mythology surrounding this famous trial and leaves us with an account that no future study can afford to overlook.

Listening to Writers Talk Politics

state." A moment later, he quotes something Mr. Vonnegut once said, that artists and writers remain politicized because of Vietnam. There is some desultory sparring about this, and then Mr. Buckley again quotes something Mr. Vonnegut said: "I hope to eventually destroy the American Army as an effective fighting force."

Mr. Mailer and Mr. Vonnegut both chuckle; Mr. Buckley is less amused. "My politics are grotesque," Mr. Vonnegut says cheerfully, while Mr. Mailer adds: "Mr. Vonnegut is famous for his sense of hyperbole." Actually, the discussion is getting into an interesting area. Members of the new class are not required to submit their ideas to any test of experience or practical politics. They may be as grotesque or as full of hyperbole as they choose.

Credit Mr. Buckley, meanwhile, with never using the words "left" or "rightist," as he questions Mr. Mailer and Mr. Vonnegut about PEN. Good manners and cultural conventions preclude the use of words like that. On the other hand, it's clear where everyone's sympathies lie. Mr. Buckley asks how PEN could oust Chile from membership in 1978, while allowing Communist dictatorships to remain. In his reply, Mr. Mailer, now the president of PEN's American chapter, mentions the United States invasion of Grenada.

Eventually, there is a discussion about the Soviet Union. Mr. Mailer, who has often described the United States as "carcinogenic" and "plastic," says insouciantly that between 1917 and 1967, one million people were murdered in the Soviet Union each year. "The point," he says, "is that the Soviet Union is not killing people like that anymore."

Mr. Buckley, paraphrasing George Orwell, then notes that the object of a totalitarian state is to reach a point where it doesn't have to bother murdering anyone.

"By that measure," Mr. Mailer says smartly, "America is far ahead of the Soviet Union and is becoming the perfect totalitarian state."

There is often a goofiness about the way artists and writers view world affairs. Objective data does not matter. (Even the bitterest Soviet émigré has never claimed that the Cheka, OGPU or NKVD murdered one million people a year for 50 years.) The depressing part, however, is not the goofiness; it's when the self-righteousness, anti-Americanism and bad manners come in.

Thus, Gore Vidal (whom Mr. Mailer cites favorably on "Firing Line" for his views on international economics) appeared on the CBS "Morning News" during the Geneva summit. Ostensibly, Mr. Vidal was there to plug his new book, but politics was more beguiling. President Reagan, he said, was "gaga," adding: "You have this sort of zombie wandering about. He doesn't know where Geneva is—he thinks he's in Nicaragua."

This wasn't amusing, although

Mr. Vidal seemed to think it was killing. A moment later, he talked about the time he ran for the Senate in California. "The system was even more corrupt than I expected," he said. "All the politicians were bought by the aerospace industry." However, what really finished his campaign, he said, was the arrival in California of Senator Edward M. Kennedy. Mr. Vidal told Maria Shriver, the co-host of the "Morning News," who is also Mr. Kennedy's niece, that everything was the fault of "your Uncle Teddy." Mr. Vidal said that Mr. Kennedy got all the publicity.

Mr. Vidal, of course, is a prominent man of letters; Mr. Mailer and Mr. Vonnegut are prominent, too. They are also public performers, exposing their psyches and politics. In the 1980's, exposure is part of the game. Since the 1930's, it has been assumed that writers and intellectuals as a group stood somewhere on the left. "The radical movement of the 30's created the American intellectual class as we now know it in its great size and influence," Lionel Trilling wrote in the 1960's. Since then, whole communities of other creative people have joined the writers and intellectuals. There is not much diversity in their views, and sometimes there is a paranoid strain.

Mr. Vonnegut, for example, appeared on public broadcasting recently in a program originally produced by the BBC. "The lies we have been fed about nuclear energy," he said, "have been as cunningly crafted as the masterpieces of Benvenuto Cellini. If we let them, they will kill everything on this lovely blue-green planet with their rebuttals to what we say here today—with their vicious, stupid lies."

Mr. Vonnegut did not identify the lies or who was telling them, nor did he say why he was singling out nuclear energy, rather than nuclear weapons. On the other hand, it didn't matter. Nuclear energy, nuclear weapons, nuclear proliferation all become one and the same. A great dark force hovers over our lives, and we are manipulated by unseen hands. The paradox is that this is a view that unites both left and right. Mr. Vonnegut's counterpart here would be someone like the Rev. Jimmy Swaggart, the television evangelist. Conspirators are the enemies on both sides. If the Communist conspiracy doesn't get us, then the military-industrial complex will.

Mr. Mailer gives us a taste of this on "Firing Line." You may think that Watergate has been reported, analyzed and judged. Mr. Mailer does not. Watergate, he says, involved "five different conspiracies," and we will not know the truth about what really happened for 50 years. Mr. Buckley reminds Mr. Mailer then that he has also said the murder of John F. Kennedy was a conspiracy. Mr. Mailer ignores him. The wonderful thing about conspiracies is that, while it can't be proved they exist, it can't be proved they don't exist. Conspiracies explain why the world is the way it is. A belief in conspiracies excuses the need for serious thinking.

Meanwhile, Mr. Buckley presses on. It is true he is conservative, but his strength as an interviewer is that he doesn't allow it to get in the way of his questions. This is one reason "Firing Line" has lasted 20 years. "Will PEN crystallize a position on the imagination of the state, identifying governments?" he asks. No, Mr. Vonnegut answers, but a "number of remarkable minds will examine it." And what does Mr. Mailer hope to gain from the meetings? "I hope that my mind will be improved," he says. That's fair enough, and Mr. Buckley doesn't push. "Firing Line" is touching on important issues.

For Younger Viewers

Mary Vreeland and Robin Pearson Rose star in the CBS Schoolbreak Special "Have You Tried Talking to Patty?" The hourlong drama, about a hearing-impaired teen-ager's attempt to win popularity by drastically changing her appearance, will be on Tuesday afternoon at 4:30.
