July 7, 1987

Dear Mr. Schefter:

Thank you for sharing with me your suggestions for the future direction of America's space program. You know as well as I that in past decades there have been some mistakes made in the conduct of our space program. Some have resulted from concentration on the space shuttle as the prime national means for access to space and from the excessive separation between the agencies conducting space programs.

In efforts to improve our space posture, and to recover from the Challenger and other accidents, we have made massive investments in both the shuttle and new types of expendable launch vehicles. We continue to forge ahead on the space station, despite the increasing cost and some measure of difficulty encountered in the negotiations with our allies. As you know, the National Commission on Space, under the leadership of Dr. Thomas O. Paine, last year set forth a number of ambitious long-range goals, and we wish to lay the technological foundation to keep our options open in the pursuit of those goals. As you are aware, a joint NASA/DOD study is underway to define the next generation of cost-effective launch systems. The National Aerospace Plane, now in the technology development phase, promises to give us a jump ahead of the competition.

The President has also asked the Economic Policy Council to review our space policy in matters of regulation, trade, and commercial development. Several agency heads, along with the Department of Defense and NASA, are currently involved.

We must continue to convince members of Congress of the enormous potential of the space program and the need for priority efforts including military, scientific, and commercial endeavors.

Reading your concerns, I am persuaded that we are on the right course for ensuring U.S. leadership in space as we move toward the 21st century.

Thank you again for writing. You have my best wishes.

Sincerely,

Howard H. Baker, Jr.
