2

The British have been concentrating more on preventing Middle Eastern terrorism from spilling over into Western Europe and the UK, rather than developing any strategy to combat Middle Eastern terrorism at its roots. The UK appears willing to work bilaterally with the U.S. on specific counterterrorist measures including civil aviation security, abuses of diplomatic privileges by states promoting terrorism, and the sharing of intelligence and other information on terrorists and terrorist groups. Both Sir Percy Cradock, Chairman, Joint Intelligence Committee and Foreign Affairs Advisor to PM Thatcher, and Robin O'Neill support bilateral discussions on specific measures in the wake of the TWA hijacking. We should use this opportunity to press the British hard on a broad range of terrorist issues and move them toward a position where they are willing to take political and economic sanctions against states sponsoring terrorism and, specifically, to support the steps we may have to take regarding Beirut.
