

Ronald Reagan Presidential Library
Digital Library Collections

---

This is a PDF of a folder from our textual collections.

---

Collection: Press Secretary, White House Office of: Press Releases and Press Briefings
Folder Title: Press Releases: 9347 11/18/1985
Box: 118

---

To see more digitized collections visit:

<https://reaganlibrary.gov/archives/digital-library>

To see all Ronald Reagan Presidential Library inventories visit:

<https://reaganlibrary.gov/document-collection>

Contact a reference archivist at: reagan.library@nara.gov

Citation Guidelines: <https://reaganlibrary.gov/citing>

National Archives Catalogue: <https://catalog.archives.gov/>

THE WHITE HOUSE

Office of the Press Secretary
(Geneva, Switzerland)

For Immediate Release

November 18, 1985

INTERVIEW OF AMBASSADOR ARTHUR HARTMAN
BY INDEPENDENT NETWORK NEWS

Hotel Intercontinental
Geneva, Switzerland

10:02 A.M. (L)

Q Mr. Ambassador, by the time we're on the air with this, it'll be less than 24 hours before the summit -- first summit session. Do you have anything nailed down yet -- any hard-and-fast agreements that you know you can take away from the summit?

AMBASSADOR HARTMAN: Well, I think one of the difficulties here is that people tend to feel that a meeting like this is entirely precooked, and what that neglects is the personalities of the leaders. Our President, and I'm sure it's exactly the same thing on the Soviet side, like to have some decisions to make themselves. And they like to feel that they are conducting a conversation that may, in fact, form what comes out of this meeting.

So, while we have some things that we've been negotiating on -- particularly in the bilateral field -- there's no decision yet what to do with them. And that's going to be left for the leaders to discuss.

Q We're told that you expect to take away an agreement on cultural exchange, an agreement on air safety, and on the councillor --

AMBASSADOR HARTMAN: Well, these are the things that are practically finished. And, so, if the leaders decided that they wanted to see that they were finished at this meeting, they could do it. I don't think any of us believe that those would be significant breakthroughs. We've come along with those agreements to this point, and they could be finished without a summit, frankly. But if people choose to finish them at this time, fine with us.

Q The Soviets have worn two faces in this pre-summit buildup. They've been friendly and outgoing at public briefings, courting the American and world press. They've also blustered somewhat, accusing the U.S. of trying to torpedo the summit in the leak of the Weinberger letter and so forth. Do you expect them to be any different in their private conversations inside those meeting rooms than they are publicly?

AMBASSADOR HARTMAN: Yes, absolutely. What you're seeing publicly, no matter how august the titles are that these guys run under -- general or academician or whatever they're called -- they are propagandists. And one of the things that you can notice as they talk about these issues is that they're always talking about the debates in our country or in our countries in the West generally. You never find them talking about any debates in the Soviet Union. You never find them talking about any differences of opinion about policy in the Soviet Union. In fact, they never talk about anything in the Soviet Union. And, indeed, their briefings never go to the Soviet Union.

So, I think one has to take with a grain of salt this whole operation that's going on. I welcome it actually. I think it's a nice idea to get them out so the Western public can really see how they handle information.

MORE

Q Well, give us some kind of measure -- some -- by contrast how you would expect the conversations inside, behind the closed doors, to go?

AMBASSADOR HARTMAN: Oh, I think the conversations behind the closed doors will be much more serious. I don't think that Mr. Gorbachev has come all this way -- I know our President hasn't -- to just make points in a kind of debate. I think when two leaders at this level get together, they're looking for a -- trying to pitch ahead their views to what should be the strategic view of our relationship; where should we be five or ten years from now. And that's the kind of level of discussion I think we're going to get from these two men. And I hope that it'll help us in some specific negotiations.

Q We've had kind of a two-, three-day storm over the release of the Weinberger letter on arms control. Do you expect the public release of that letter to make a difference -- a dime's worth of difference -- inside the summit room? It made a lot of it outside, but --

AMBASSADOR HARTMAN: Yes, well, that's because no one had anything else to write about these couple of days.

Q Well, the Soviets made a lot out of it.

AMBASSADOR HARTMAN: Yes, they make a lot out of --

Q But in --

AMBASSADOR HARTMAN: -- anything that happens on our side.

Q Inside, is it going to make a dime's worth of difference?

AMBASSADOR HARTMAN: No, no. I don't think so because everyone knows that our Defense Department has been very unhappy, and, indeed, our government's been very unhappy about violations of the SALT II agreement. And that will be one of the considerations that goes into the President's decision-making when he decides whether to continue his present policy of not undercutting the SALT II agreements. That's no surprise to the Soviets. We've been taking it up with them right here in Geneva in a special committee designed just to discuss this sort of thing.

Q Human rights issue: Immediately before the summit the Soviets made what some within the administration have termed a token good-will gesture. Do you have any reason to expect that it will go beyond the token good-will gesture?

AMBASSADOR HARTMAN: Well, first, I'd like to caution on the gesture. To my knowledge, no one on that list has received official word from the Soviet government. This is all based on a conversation one of my officers had in Moscow with someone in the Foreign Office. I would prefer not to make any judgments at all about even that small list until the people -- the individuals -- are notified and until we know if there are any conditions attached.

Abe Stolarz has twice in the past received permission to leave. He's an American citizen. But there always have been conditions attached to it -- that his daughter-in-law, for example, cannot go with him, either because her mother does not wish to give her permission or because the son and daughter-in-law were not married properly by Soviet law.

So I just want to wait to see what happens. I think if these go ahead it is a gesture; we welcome it. And we would obviously like to see others in the same position treated in the same way.

MORE

Q Do you think it might depend on how the General Secretary judges his talks with the President are going?

AMBASSADOR HARTMAN: I have no idea what would influence his decision.

Q Thank you, Mr. Ambassador.

END

10:08 A.M. (L)

THE WHITE HOUSE

Office of the Press Secretary
(Geneva, Switzerland)

For Immediate Release

November 18, 1985

INTERVIEW OF AMBASSADOR ARTHUR HARTMAN
BY INDEPENDENT NETWORK NEWS

Hotel Intercontinental
Geneva, Switzerland

10:02 A.M. (L)

Q Mr. Ambassador, by the time we're on the air with this, it'll be less than 24 hours before the summit -- first summit session. Do you have anything nailed down yet -- any hard-and-fast agreements that you know you can take away from the summit?

AMBASSADOR HARTMAN: Well, I think one of the difficulties here is that people tend to feel that a meeting like this is entirely precooked, and what that neglects is the personalities of the leaders. Our President, and I'm sure it's exactly the same thing on the Soviet side, like to have some decisions to make themselves. And they like to feel that they are conducting a conversation that may, in fact, form what comes out of this meeting.

So, while we have some things that we've been negotiating on -- particularly in the bilateral field -- there's no decision yet what to do with them. And that's going to be left for the leaders to discuss.

Q We're told that you expect to take away an agreement on cultural exchange, an agreement on air safety, and on the councillor --

AMBASSADOR HARTMAN: Well, these are the things that are practically finished. And, so, if the leaders decided that they wanted to see that they were finished at this meeting, they could do it. I don't think any of us believe that those would be significant breakthroughs. We've come along with those agreements to this point, and they could be finished without a summit, frankly. But if people choose to finish them at this time, fine with us.

Q The Soviets have worn two faces in this pre-summit buildup. They've been friendly and outgoing at public briefings, courting the American and world press. They've also blustered somewhat, accusing the U.S. of trying to torpedo the summit in the leak of the Weinberger letter and so forth. Do you expect them to be any different in their private conversations inside those meeting rooms than they are publicly?

AMBASSADOR HARTMAN: Yes, absolutely. What you're seeing publicly, no matter how august the titles are that these guys run under -- general or academician or whatever they're called -- they are propagandists. And one of the things that you can notice as they talk about these issues is that they're always talking about the debates in our country or in our countries in the West generally. You never find them talking about any debates in the Soviet Union. You never find them talking about any differences of opinion about policy in the Soviet Union. In fact, they never talk about anything in the Soviet Union. And, indeed, their briefings never go to the Soviet Union.

So, I think one has to take with a grain of salt this whole operation that's going on. I welcome it actually. I think it's a nice idea to get them out so the Western public can really see how they handle information.

MORE

Q Well, give us some kind of measure -- some -- by contrast how you would expect the conversations inside, behind the closed doors, to go?

AMBASSADOR HARTMAN: Oh, I think the conversations behind the closed doors will be much more serious. I don't think that Mr. Gorbachev has come all this way -- I know our President hasn't -- to just make points in a kind of debate. I think when two leaders at this level get together, they're looking for a -- trying to pitch ahead their views to what should be the strategic view of our relationship; where should we be five or ten years from now. And that's the kind of level of discussion I think we're going to get from these two men. And I hope that it'll help us in some specific negotiations.

Q We've had kind of a two-, three-day storm over the release of the Weinberger letter on arms control. Do you expect the public release of that letter to make a difference -- a dime's worth of difference -- inside the summit room? It made a lot of it outside, but --

AMBASSADOR HARTMAN: Yes, well, that's because no one had anything else to write about these couple of days.

Q Well, the Soviets made a lot out of it.

AMBASSADOR HARTMAN: Yes, they make a lot out of --

Q But in --

AMBASSADOR HARTMAN: -- anything that happens on our side.

Q Inside, is it going to make a dime's worth of difference?

AMBASSADOR HARTMAN: No, no. I don't think so because everyone knows that our Defense Department has been very unhappy, and, indeed, our government's been very unhappy about violations of the SALT II agreement. And that will be one of the considerations that goes into the President's decision-making when he decides whether to continue his present policy of not undercutting the SALT II agreements. That's no surprise to the Soviets. We've been taking it up with them right here in Geneva in a special committee designed just to discuss this sort of thing.

Q Human rights issue: Immediately before the summit the Soviets made what some within the administration have termed a token good-will gesture. Do you have any reason to expect that it will go beyond the token good-will gesture?

AMBASSADOR HARTMAN: Well, first, I'd like to caution on the gesture. To my knowledge, no one on that list has received official word from the Soviet government. This is all based on a conversation one of my officers had in Moscow with someone in the Foreign Office. I would prefer not to make any judgments at all about even that small list until the people -- the individuals -- are notified and until we know if there are any conditions attached.

Abe Stolarz has twice in the past received permission to leave. He's an American citizen. But there always have been conditions attached to it -- that his daughter-in-law, for example, cannot go with him, either because her mother does not wish to give her permission or because the son and daughter-in-law were not married properly by Soviet law.

So I just want to wait to see what happens. I think if these go ahead it is a gesture; we welcome it. And we would obviously like to see others in the same position treated in the same way.

MORE

Q Do you think it might depend on how the General Secretary judges his talks with the President are going?

AMBASSADOR HARTMAN: I have no idea what would influence his decision.

Q Thank you, Mr. Ambassador.

END

10:08 A.M. (L)

THE WHITE HOUSE

Office of the Press Secretary
(Geneva, Switzerland)

For Immediate Release

November 18, 1985

INTERVIEW OF AMBASSADOR ARTHUR HARTMAN
BY INDEPENDENT NETWORK NEWS

Hotel Intercontinental
Geneva, Switzerland

10:02 A.M. (L)

Q Mr. Ambassador, by the time we're on the air with this, it'll be less than 24 hours before the summit -- first summit session. Do you have anything nailed down yet -- any hard-and-fast agreements that you know you can take away from the summit?

AMBASSADOR HARTMAN: Well, I think one of the difficulties here is that people tend to feel that a meeting like this is entirely precooked, and what that neglects is the personalities of the leaders. Our President, and I'm sure it's exactly the same thing on the Soviet side, like to have some decisions to make themselves. And they like to feel that they are conducting a conversation that may, in fact, form what comes out of this meeting.

So, while we have some things that we've been negotiating on -- particularly in the bilateral field -- there's no decision yet what to do with them. And that's going to be left for the leaders to discuss.

Q We're told that you expect to take away an agreement on cultural exchange, an agreement on air safety, and on the councillor --

AMBASSADOR HARTMAN: Well, these are the things that are practically finished. And, so, if the leaders decided that they wanted to see that they were finished at this meeting, they could do it. I don't think any of us believe that those would be significant breakthroughs. We've come along with those agreements to this point, and they could be finished without a summit, frankly. But if people choose to finish them at this time, fine with us.

Q The Soviets have worn two faces in this pre-summit buildup. They've been friendly and outgoing at public briefings, courting the American and world press. They've also blustered somewhat, accusing the U.S. of trying to torpedo the summit in the leak of the Weinberger letter and so forth. Do you expect them to be any different in their private conversations inside those meeting rooms than they are publicly?

AMBASSADOR HARTMAN: Yes, absolutely. What you're seeing publicly, no matter how august the titles are that these guys run under -- general or academician or whatever they're called -- they are propagandists. And one of the things that you can notice as they talk about these issues is that they're always talking about the debates in our country or in our countries in the West generally. You never find them talking about any debates in the Soviet Union. You never find them talking about any differences of opinion about policy in the Soviet Union. In fact, they never talk about anything in the Soviet Union. And, indeed, their briefings never go to the Soviet Union.

So, I think one has to take with a grain of salt this whole operation that's going on. I welcome it actually. I think it's a nice idea to get them out so the Western public can really see how they handle information.

MORE

Q Well, give us some kind of measure -- some -- by contrast how you would expect the conversations inside, behind the closed doors, to go?

AMBASSADOR HARTMAN: Oh, I think the conversations behind the closed doors will be much more serious. I don't think that Mr. Gorbachev has come all this way -- I know our President hasn't -- to just make points in a kind of debate. I think when two leaders at this level get together, they're looking for a -- trying to pitch ahead their views to what should be the strategic view of our relationship; where should we be five or ten years from now. And that's the kind of level of discussion I think we're going to get from these two men. And I hope that it'll help us in some specific negotiations.

Q We've had kind of a two-, three-day storm over the release of the Weinberger letter on arms control. Do you expect the public release of that letter to make a difference -- a dime's worth of difference -- inside the summit room? It made a lot of it outside, but --

AMBASSADOR HARTMAN: Yes, well, that's because no one had anything else to write about these couple of days.

Q Well, the Soviets made a lot out of it.

AMBASSADOR HARTMAN: Yes, they make a lot out of --

Q But in --

AMBASSADOR HARTMAN: -- anything that happens on our side.

Q Inside, is it going to make a dime's worth of difference?

AMBASSADOR HARTMAN: No, no. I don't think so because everyone knows that our Defense Department has been very unhappy, and, indeed, our government's been very unhappy about violations of the SALT II agreement. And that will be one of the considerations that goes into the President's decision-making when he decides whether to continue his present policy of not undercutting the SALT II agreements. That's no surprise to the Soviets. We've been taking it up with them right here in Geneva in a special committee designed just to discuss this sort of thing.

Q Human rights issue: Immediately before the summit the Soviets made what some within the administration have termed a token good-will gesture. Do you have any reason to expect that it will go beyond the token good-will gesture?

AMBASSADOR HARTMAN: Well, first, I'd like to caution on the gesture. To my knowledge, no one on that list has received official word from the Soviet government. This is all based on a conversation one of my officers had in Moscow with someone in the Foreign Office. I would prefer not to make any judgments at all about even that small list until the people -- the individuals -- are notified and until we know if there are any conditions attached.

Abe Stolarz has twice in the past received permission to leave. He's an American citizen. But there always have been conditions attached to it -- that his daughter-in-law, for example, cannot go with him, either because her mother does not wish to give her permission or because the son and daughter-in-law were not married properly by Soviet law.

So I just want to wait to see what happens. I think if these go ahead it is a gesture; we welcome it. And we would obviously like to see others in the same position treated in the same way.

Q Do you think it might depend on how the General Secretary judges his talks with the President are going?

AMBASSADOR HARTMAN: I have no idea what would influence his decision.

Q Thank you, Mr. Ambassador.

END

10:08 A.M. (L)